MINERS MEMORIAL

On June 20, 1984, two hundred miners working underground in Sudbury, Ontario's Falconbridge nickel mine felt the earth shift. Rocks fell, killing three workers immediately, while one died an estimated fifteen minutes before rescuers reached him after twenty-seven hours of digging. The 3.5-magnitude earthquake, and the resulting deaths, sparked off Sudbury's first miners' memorial event the following year.

In 1986, Cumberland became the first community in British Columbia to host a similar event. Even though decades had passed since the mines closed in Cumberland, the memories of mining and the sense of grief over the loss of life underground remained. Between 1888 and 1964, the Cumberland mines claimed the lives of over three hundred miners.

Over the years, Miners Memorial has attracted hundreds of visitors from BC and beyond, and has contributed to shaping the landscape and sense of place in the community through a series of special projects including cairns, signage, and plaques. Last year, hundreds gathered to honour the one hundredth anniversary of the shooting death of local union organizer Albert "Ginger" Goodwin, as part of the thirty-third annual event. The diverse program included the re-creation of Goodwin's funeral procession down Dunsmuir Avenue.

The Cumberland Museum and Archives, with support from partners including the Campbell River, Courtenay and District Labour Council, continues to play an important role in acknowledging, celebrating, and commemorating labour and working history. The 34th annual Miners Memorial, June 21 to 23, 2019, includes workshops, guided walking tours, graveside vigils, 'Songs of the Workers', theatre, the Miners Memorial BBQ, and more. All proceeds support the Cumberland Museum and Archives.
